

Review of: "[Viewpoint] Vaccination campaigns against Covid-19 may promote vaccine hesitancy toward mostly well-established, safe, and effective vaccines"

L.G. Shareef¹

¹ Al Rasheed University College

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

I express profound appreciation for the kind invitation to write this review. One major statement in this paper caught my attention. I'm afraid I have to disagree with the author's assertion that "Trust in public institutions has been a key factor in the acceptance of vaccines in the past." I request that the authors do a comprehensive analysis of vaccine hesitancy related to vaccines and vaccination, considering a global perspective before the year 2019. It is worth noting that this topic has been extensively discussed throughout multiple studies, predating the emergence of the COVID-19 pandemic. It may be necessary to conduct research in order to assess the levels of reluctance seen during previous pandemics in comparison to the most recent one.