

Review of: "What Went So Wrong in Economics"

Mauro L. Baranzini¹

¹ Accademia Nazionale dei Lincei

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

Frederic Jennings' essay is a provocative and thoughtful reconstruction of the XX Century painstaking debate on the role of increasing and decreasing returns in the production processes, set against time (i.e. short, medium and long-period). It quotes the most of the relevant literature, and the fact that the Dixit-Stiglitz 1977 paper is not quoted does certainly not invalidate the arguments put forward by the author. Research students thinking of taking up these issues will find this essay useful, let alone the rich list of literature quoted.