This article titled "The Correlation between Poverty and Crime in Pakistan" addresses a crucial topic, but it falls short in several key areas, hindering its overall credibility and impact. One notable weakness is the lack of a strong theoretical foundation, leaving readers questioning the framework upon which the correlation between poverty and crime is explored. A solid theoretical basis is essential to guide the research and provide context for the findings. Moreover, the article lacks methodological rigor, as evidenced by the absence of sufficient evidence to support its claims. Statistical data is presented without in-text citations, making it challenging for readers to verify the information and assess its reliability. This omission undermines the scholarly integrity of the article and diminishes its potential contribution to the understanding of the poverty-crime relationship in Pakistan. Additionally, the article would benefit from a more comprehensive review of existing literature to contextualize the research within the broader academic discourse. A thorough literature review helps establish the gap the study aims to fill and provides a basis for comparison with previous research. To enhance the article's credibility and scholarly value, the author should consider revisiting the methodology, providing in-text citations for statistical data, strengthening the theoretical foundation, and conducting a more thorough literature review. Addressing these shortcomings will contribute to a more robust and convincing exploration of the correlation between poverty and crime in the context of Pakistan.
