

Review of: "Ecotheology: missiological perspective in awareness"

Javier Martínez Baigorri

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

This paper focuses in a very interesting topic for theology: environmental crisis. The starting point is human responsibility in the care of creation. It is, precisely, the use of this theological category, creation, where resides the strength of the paper. Theologians of different Christian churches have used creation as a key category; especially the defenders of the pantheistic model. This is the reason why the proposal presented in this text can dialogue with other authors who think theology from scientific light.

An adequate use of data about climate crisis in Indonesia is made, and also is adequately justified the importance of contemplating them in a theological reflection. Undoubtedly, there are concepts that require greater depth, as ecotheology. Therefore, this paper should be considered as an introductory work that could be extended in the future.