As an exploratory study is well defined, it is a replication of another study.

I have not seen clear research objectives. The methodology based on the review of a platform where the participants of mystical-religious experiences with respect to death, leaves me doubtful of its true validity for society, it would have been more beneficial for the study to have carried out a questionnaire, possibly responses would have been collected more valuable. The sample recognizes that the majority of the United States is included, that reduces the richness of experiences, since I believe that each person's religious education influences the explanation or evaluation of the experience.

They have quantified what was described in those experiences. For some people, the conclusions reached will be illuminating, where the most that has occurred is a blinding light, full of love, peace, very generic expressions when we talk about death. I think this article helps believers take a position on their religious ideas and values.

Further research could be proposed by collecting data through interviews and with more varied populations.
