

Review of: "The Role of Women's Business Performance in Promoting Sustainable Development"

Zdenek Mikolas

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The article "The role of Women's Business Performance in Promoting Sustainable Development" is inspiring. I evaluate it positively. Women's business must be devoted to both local and global perspective. The article motivated me to reflect on this topical topic.

First. Women's business is greatly influenced by a number of other factors: culture, religion, social status of a woman in society, psychological, emotional and physical factors, etc. These factors are specific to different regions, states, continents. Therefore, narrow economic analyzes are not sufficient to investigate women's business.

Second. Statistical methods (correlations, regression) do not mostly describe causal relations between the cause and the consequence. Therefore, considerable attention should be paid to the determination of hypotheses and the interpretation of research results (statistical analyzes).

Third. Independent variables can become addicted as a result of new knowledge (in the lower strata of the relationships being examined) for various reasons (for example, new knowledge in natural and social sciences, a change in state policy, the impact of wars and migration, the impact of illegal activities, etc.).

It follows that the article is useful not only from the local point of view, but also inspires other theoretical considerations.

prof. Ing. Zdenek Mikolas, CSc., prof. h. c., PEUNI, Prague, Czech Republic