

Review of: "Shaping Tomorrow's Workforce: Adapting University Curriculum to Address China's College Graduate Employment Challenges"

Kaixu Shao

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

This paper discusses the employment difficulties faced by college graduates in China, and puts forward some strategies to solve this problem. However, there are still some areas that need improvement. It is far from enough that the summary only emphasizes the importance of employment.

In your article, you pointed out that "effectively solving the problem of difficult employment of college graduates is a multidimensional problem, which requires the joint efforts of the government, universities, enterprises, students and other parties."

However, attribution analysis and strategy are not systematic. It is suggested that this article can make systematic attribution and propose strategies from social factors, family factors, school factors and self-factors.