Even if the topic of the study could be of high interest to our domain of expertise, before considering it for publication, there are some aspects that should be highlighted: the data are insufficient, the methodology and statistical analysis are practically missing. Considering the lack of information, the conclusions are not supported by the presented results. In my opinion, before considering submitting the research, you should present your work respecting the manuscript preparation (for example, the methodology should be sufficiently detailed in order for others to replicate and build on published results; furthermore, new methods and protocols should be described in detail, while well-established methods can be briefly described and appropriately cited. The data should be sufficient to perform an adequate statistical analysis that may validate your findings).
