Many congratulations for this nice research initiative.

I have some observations:

The interview is a very interesting and complex technique within the qualitative methods, however, the number of samples to consider, is related to the level of saturation of information received (when the information is already repetitive and does not contribute novelty for research, or new variables). However, in the approach to the methodology of this article, it is not established what the sample number of 15 people is due to. It would be appropriate to detail this in the methodology.

It is necessary to have more graphic information, such as a location map of the study area (consider that not all readers know their country), a map of the cave (if it exists), maps of the cavity and of the impacts reported in this work.

Within the text there is information that is repeated, this must be verified, so as not to make reading heavy.

There is information that does not add depth to the proposed study, for example defining what a graffiti or painting is. On the other hand, there is minimal information on one of the proposed objectives: To suggest strategies that may be adopted to minimize the negative impacts of tourist activities at heritage sites.

It would be interesting to make a diagram of driving forces, in which it is established if the negative impacts are more influential than the positive impacts in this environment.

Regards and Good job...
