Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The paper presents a valuable study on the knowledge, beliefs, and attitudes about sexuality among adolescents in a secondary school setting. Here's a review of the key elements:

Introduction: The introduction clearly outlines the importance of sex education in schools and sets a strong premise for the study. It effectively communicates the goal of creating a profile to inform future interventions.

Materials and Methods: The methodology is well-defined, using a descriptive, correlational, cross-sectional approach. The use of validated scales (QCS and QACSES) adds credibility to the study. However, it would be beneficial to include more details about the questionnaire design and how it was administered.

Results: The results section provides clear demographic data and highlights significant correlations between gender, age, previous education on sexuality, and the students' knowledge and attitudes. The presentation of statistical significance is good, but the paper could be strengthened by including specific statistical values or measures of effect size.

Conclusions: The conclusion is succinct and reaffirms the suitability of the instruments used. It would be advantageous to discuss the implications of the findings for future educational programs and potential limitations of the study.

Overall, the paper is well-structured and addresses a significant topic. For further improvement, consider expanding on the implications of the research, discussing limitations, and possibly comparing the findings with existing literature on the subject. Great work on contributing to this important field of study!
