

Review of: "Determinants of Micro, Small and Medium Enterprises (MSMEs) Sustainable Development in Africa"

Rogis Baker¹

¹ National Defence University of Malaysia

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The article's topic is particularly intriguing since it focuses on the elements that support MSMEs' sustainable development in Africa. Because the subject is so broad and there is a wealth of literature on it, this study must critically consider if such a study is necessary. Nonetheless, the study's conclusions and findings are rather broad. The impact of the findings and their implications for Africa's sustainable development require a more thorough explanation from the writers. The introduction is really poor. The paper's scope, need, aims, and originality are all missing. A literature review (LR) ought to be more extended and focused. Since the entire study is predicated on these factors, the identification of determinants is flawed and is the paper's main problem. Conclusion lacks coherence.