The article briefly describes the evidence found in relation to the action of certain drugs that showed antiviral action in vitro based on research carried out in Mexico. However, it does not provide information if these findings are on par with other research carried out outside of Mexico; if compared to other research they are novel, or if some of them are already being tested in clinical trials. It leaves a somewhat bitter taste in the mouth because it only succinctly describes isolated findings when the problem of dengue is rather global. I think that the authors should finish doing a more thorough review, or in any case not publish this attempted review.
