An interesting article and worth supporting. It is always good approach to show the role of corruption in any society. Corruption in general terms is very devastating albeit there are some academics who claim that this is the "grease for the wheel" and supposed to be kept on moderate level. From my perspective this is valid approach. I spent some time in Nigeria / business contract/ as well as made many researches on shadow economy including corruption. So, there is justification for the scope of the article. Anyway article is properly structured. One can find out – theoretical part, methodological and discussion. I suggest to make more justification on the assumed research tools. Criteria of experts? Which were considered? Experts were corrupted or not? Even though literature review is coherent with the title I suggest to make it more sound. Conclusions supposed to be developed. They have both empirical and practical value. I am pretty sure that tThose remarks are minor ones and Authors can cope with them skilfully.
