With the exception of the final few lines in the summary section, which detail the outcomes of the new structure, the other sections are written in a generic manner. The introduction section needs to follow a scientific structure and should involve a comprehensive analysis of the issue, including the public activities that have been undertaken so far, and which aspects of these activities the article covers. The background section can be personalized and combined with the related work section to discuss the pros and cons of the work carried out, without any payment. Despite the author's explanations, the article lacks a scientific structure, particularly in terms of originality and innovation.
