The manuscript presents a review of a current problem of interest to the scientific community.

Overall, the document is well written and uses an appropriate number of references for a review paper.

On the other hand, the abstract can be improved by including the main ideas of the conclusions. Furthermore, the manuscript becomes a little tedious to read since it does not have figures, comparative tables, or method diagrams that could better explain what the authors propose or find.

The conclusions are well structured, but they are a bit diffuse. You should be more specific when models or methods are mentioned, for example.
