The article is new and interesting enough to justify publication. The title and the abstract reflect the content of the paper, being clearly exposed.

The present paper studies how university students from urban areas engage in fieldwork studies and how they mature through such an experience. Many rural areas have been trying to work with universities to solve regional problems. This paper suggests fieldwork studies in rural areas to revitalize declined rural areas with high population mobility.

Introduction: The introduction specifies the purpose of the approach and the main contribution of the author. Clarifying how universities and regions can work together is an important issue from the perspective of higher education and considering the management of rural areas with declining populations.

The Theoretical Framework: The connection is made between the subject of the paper and that of the previous studies, making bibliographical references from the specialized literature.

Research Methodology: The research methodology is not specified. A small number of figures and tables are used.

Conclusion: There is no conclusion to the manuscript.

Recommendation: Acceptance with minor changes.
