The reviews in the commentary have really enhanced this article. This is an article that is so very much needed to inform clinicians and those front line professionals who work in this area. The biopsychosocial approach which is evidenced in this article will raise- significant awareness of the array of related mental and physical health issues that are so very often missed, or not explored which has a detrimental impact on the overall well being of the female with a neurodisability. Equally important, it highlights the challenges and SUBTLE behaviours and presentation of females when they engage with these professionals. This will provide the professional with a deeper insight into how females with a neurodisability ACT or present when they are placed in these very stressful situations, which hopefully will lead to better practice. The knowledge displayed in this article is excellent and reflects the extensive research and personal experiences of those, who this article represents. This is a wonderful introductory piece which I am sure will be the first of many.
