

Review of: "Ethical and political consumption: an integrated typology of practices"

Lucirene Rangel¹

¹ Universidad del Noreste

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

It is a research article that recognizes the importance of consumption through its socioeconomic and political impact. The proposal is valuable and evokes new questions regarding the variables considered in the analysis of consumption in the current paradigm. It seems to me that it opens up new lines of research that should be added to the discussion of future studies. With the support of a greater number of referents, the author would raise the value of each argument even more. The development of the typologies is interesting from their considerations. It is suggested to deepen the discussion regarding the following points in consumption: the legal consumption is always ethical?; how can a consumer decision be declared in a political sense?; how?; as well as exposing the contextual nuance in relation to the consumption of countries in which certain practices/decisions/consumption have not been regulated by any law, being considered as common practices.