This paper appears as a basic conceptual analysis despite being reasonably thorough in its initial research and presentation. Furthermore, it would be vital to include more citations and references to accurately account for the complexity of this topic. If the researcher's previous studies or academic work products served as the foundation for this study's purpose, the methodology, conclusions, and discussion sections should also be included and expanded for a more comprehensive explanation. Despite the lack of novelty regarding this research topic, while this article has primarily focused on a particular phrase used by Muslims, such research should also exhibit more connectivity with other contextually related terms. It is admirable why and how this research idea can benefit institutions and organizations broadly, without being solely limited to Muslim-based individuals and organizations. Likewise, this paper also attempts to explain how such an idea could be practically implemented in practice depending on the various environmental surroundings or the organization's cultural values (see Schein and Hofstede et al. for additional informational support). Previously, other reviews of this article have provided valuable suggestions and recommendations to further elaborate and explain the cultural ideals that are typically associated with Ta'awun and its useful connections to enhancing organizational and social cohesion.
