1. This article effectively demonstrates the significant impact of the COVID-19 pandemic on the livelihoods of indigenous peoples, emphasizing their dependence on natural resources and the challenges posed by government restrictions. 2. The discussion on gender relations and the division of labor within the indigenous community adds a critical dimension to the analysis, showing how traditional roles and cultural norms influence economic and social activities. 3. While the qualitative approach provides depth, the absence of quantitative data makes it difficult to generalize the findings or measure the extent of the impact. 4. This article does not provide specific strategies or examples of successful interventions.
