I believe that in the keywords there should be: sexuality, sexual abuse.

Repetition of words in the same sentence at the beginning of the article.

There could be a discussion about additional penalties. For example, there is a debate (outside the article) that chemical castration does not have the desired effect.

There is repetition of information throughout the article. A review is needed.

Better explain the context of the interviewees for the study. It got a little vague. The information is relevant, but how did you arrive at these interviews?

I felt the lack of international human rights documents, ratified by the country, that talk about sexuality education. In addition, there may be more information about the benefits of sexuality education for the cited audience. Including the need for teacher training in sex education, after all, it is in the school environment that many of these issues are addressed.

I missed a slightly more robust conclusion.
