The article addresses an important problem related to feminist perspectives, neutrality in law, gender-sensitive teaching and research, and the role of "sex" and "gender" in legal norms. Nevertheless, the author tries to answer to different set of question one regarding constitutional interpretation and the other legal education and research. Maybe these should be to different papers so in both cases the theoretical framework could be strengthened. When addressing the constitutional interpretation question, it might be interesting to provide examples of judicial decisions that have a feminist perspective and compare them with cases that lack this analysis rendering them unjust.
