

Review of: "Post-Conflict Reconstruction: How Social Identity Change Informs our Understanding of the Ukrainian Experience of Forced Migration"

Athanasia Chalari¹

¹ London School of Economics and Political Science, University of London

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

I very much enjoyed reading this paper. It was written clearly, following a well organised structure, putting forward clear arguments.

This work had something new and ambitious to say, and it was said by following a thoroughly justified argumentation.

The methods have been well explained (perhaps longer than needed), and the analysis was very clearly presented.

This work stands nicely on its own, both on a theoretical and on a methodological ground.

As a sociologist, I would have liked to read more on the impact of the socio-cultural context (British) on the identity change (perhaps transformation?) of the participants, but I can appreciate that this has not been the target of this work. Also, I would be curious to see if and how 'trauma' may have something to add to this discussion, but again, this work had a different focus.