Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

This article offers a sobering glimpse into Bangladesh's escalating methamphetamine dilemma, particularly focusing on the rise of crystal methamphetamine alongside the already pervasive Yaba addiction. While it effectively underscores the severity of the issue through compelling statistics and anecdotal evidence, it tends to overlook deeper socio-economic factors and governmental policies that contribute to the problem, thus missing an opportunity for a more comprehensive analysis.

While urging for urgent governmental intervention and public awareness campaigns, the article lacks specificity in proposing actionable solutions beyond general calls to action. A deeper exploration of potential strategies, such as harm reduction programs and international collaborations, would enrich the discussion. Moreover, the absence of a critical examination of potential biases or limitations in the data undermines the article's overall reliability.

In terms of presentation, the article is organized and accessible, employing clear language and relevant citations. Overall, while the article effectively highlights the gravity of Bangladesh's methamphetamine crisis, it would benefit from a more nuanced approach and a deeper exploration of potential solutions.
