

Review of: "Who Is Responsible for Preventing Children's Sexual Harassment?"

Suriah Suriah¹

¹ Hasanuddin University

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

Child sexual abuse remains a daunting and unresolved issue, even in developing countries. This article presents an overview of the stakeholders who should play a role in addressing this problem. The following are some considerations for the author to enhance the scientific study of this article:

Abstract Enrichment:

- In the abstract section, it is advisable to add information regarding the procedures for selecting or determining the participants involved in the research. This will provide context on how the study was conducted.
- Include research recommendations that reference the findings to provide a long-term perspective for the readers.

Additional Methodological Details:

- In the methodology section, provide more detailed information about the number of participants involved in the research, along with a scientific justification and the criteria used for purposive participant selection. This will help readers understand the rationale behind participant selection.

Mention and Explain Qualitative Data Analysis:

- The author should explicitly state and explain the type of qualitative data analysis used in the research. This will provide insight into how the data was examined and interpreted.

Formulate Research Recommendations and Implications Based on Findings:

- It would be beneficial to formulate research recommendations and implications based on the research findings. This can provide guidance on how the study's results can be applied in practice or inform policy decisions.