First, the content of this article is both needed and timely. Researching this area can shed light on our culture and the difficulties some face, and disperse their experience. In the abstract, some of the writing is not concise or clear and can have improved grammar. On p. 6 or 7, when describing the study design and goal, you need more specific details (conducted at a university, for instance). When describing your survey instruments, you need to reference specifically which instruments influenced the development of yours. What are the demographics of the university you surveyed? I did not see where you described the makeup of the universities; this impacts your sample. The study is good, and if the manuscript were cleaned up a bit, both grammatically and descriptively, it would be better.
