The new version of this article provides an integral vision of women's participation in the entrepreneurial arena. As I stated before, the perspective it offers emerges from the experience of social innovation practitioners in a fascinating context.

The authors reviewed significant contributions, which led to the framework they explored in their paper.

The objectives are clear, though objective two might deserve a more in-depth discussion. However, the body of the article includes elements that comply with the proposed scheme.

Regarding the methodology employed, it is interesting to note the magnitude of work and dedication required to obtain 5000 women entrepreneurs' responses, which is very significant to validate the results of this research. The survey is well structured, concise, and conducive to the information required to assess the participant's responses.

The results indicate the critical trend of increasing participation of women in entrepreneurial dynamics as a crucial point to accomplish social change and community wellbeing.

I confirm my recommendation for accepting this article for publication. It constitutes a relevant contribution to impulsing the participation of women in social and entrepreneurial innovation.
