

Review of: "Necessity Was the Mother of Human Cultural Invention"

Alexander Shkurko

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

I liked the new version of the manuscript; it is now more concise and convincing, and there are several new sections that are particularly interesting. I still think that many issues regarding the mechanisms of interaction between genetic and cultural evolution, as well as the conceptual difference between the two, remain unaddressed, and I am not sure that I understand what the 'necessity' was that led to unique human cultural evolution, but this is inevitable for such complex topics. In any case, the discussion is useful and interesting.