Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

1. The title of your study suggests that it covers the entire region of Vietnam, but the abstract specifically focuses on students in Hanoi. It might be more accurate to align the title with the content or clarify the scope in the abstract.
2. While the abstract details the factors examined in the study, it might benefit from including a brief summary of the main findings or outcomes, so readers can quickly understand the significance and implications of the research.
3. The introduction introduces a broad picture of the era and the importance of laptops, which is good. However, it might benefit from a more concise presentation. Focus on streamlining the information and emphasizing the importance of understanding students' buying behavior in Vietnam specifically.
4. The descriptions of the Theory of Reasoned Action (TRA) and the Theory of Planned Behavior (TPB) are clear, providing readers with an understanding of their significance in the study. However, consider emphasizing more explicitly how these theories relate to your research topic on laptop buying behavior.
5. Be consistent with your terminology. For instance, don't switch between "laptop" and "computer" unless you're making a clear distinction.
