

Review of: "Sola Scriptura to Improve the Quality of Christian Students in Thinking Characteristics"

Kevin Storer

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

I am very much in agreement with the overall argument of this article. Yet I think we need to clarify our arguments a bit more to make it effective. For example, Catholic Christians tend (overall) to be quite more focused on "character development" in "Moral Theology" than are Protestants (especially Evangelicals). They may have much to offer for what you are trying to say, yet "sola Scriptura" is not their lens. I would like to see what, exactly, sola Scriptura accomplishes in forming a distinctive Christian character. What, for example, would be different about a "sola Scriptura" Christian from other Christians who are focused on Christian character?