Review of: "Indian Health Ministry Refuses to Make Cancer a Notifiable Disease Despite ICMR's Recommendation"

The short commentary highlights the need for making cancer notifiable at the national level in India. While this is important, the need for making cancer notifiable at the national level, despite health being a state subject, needs to be put forward with some more detail.

What role does the parliamentary committee play in such issues of national interest, even though they may be state subjects, can be further highlighted.

What is the role of ICMR-NCDIR and how it has not been able to achieve universal record-keeping despite being decades old must be highlighted.

The commentary has policy implications and must be published.
