

Review of: "Decolonisation of Health in East Africa: Opinion Piece"

Beverly Ochieng¹

¹ Tropical Institute Of Community Health And Development

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

Decolonizing health in East Africa

Title: in regard to the body of the article, Tanzania has been highly analyzed and not East Africa in particular, the rest of the highlights are examples is Africa continent in general

Abstract:

Recommendation for abstract structure:

Background: the context and purpose of the study;

Introduction: help the reader understand the word decolonizing health.

Method: the process that was involved in writing the article

Results: the main findings;

Conclusion: brief summary and potential implications.

There is much talk on Britain's health policies, NIH composition and Brain drain quite confusing from the topic (decolonizing health)

I read much more of brain drain from Africa in general and only the country in East Africa highlighted is Tanzania. East Africa has more than seven countries it will be ideal to highlight more than one just one country in the block.

Workforce: the brain drain highlighted is Africa in general, are there case of examples of East Africa countries as highlighted in the topic? Will be good idea to reflect on several east African countries too.

Politics: Mainly focuses on Britain's policies, what about the impact of brain drain specifically in East Africa and the guiding principles in the immigration of health care workers

Changing Clinical Priorities and Practice: There are more than seven countries in the East Africa block but on Tanzania have been highlighted in the terms of collaboration are there cases in the rest of the countries? Would be great if they are highlighted too,.

Academic Challenges: Highlights Africa in general, with only two countries in East Africa, where as East Africa has more than seven countries. The paper heavily talks of Tanzania and not East Africa as per the title.

Parallel Strategies and Future Priorities sections are well articulated