Visual data is always a great source of inspiration for researchers and social critics. The present article makes a very genuine case for monetary struggle through visual narrative. Nigeria's financial crisis has been adequately photographed and explicated by the writer. In fact, the expression 'you are not the only person' or 'you are not the only one here' has become a slang narrative used by official agencies across the globe to recount the struggles of common people while facing such situations. It has become a way of generalizing problematic situations. The writer has provided an apt example of this narrative.
