The paper presents a powerful discussion about epistemology in archeology studies.

The author raises important questions about conceptual perspectives on studies and how archaeologists make their conceptual choices.

The author agrees with numerous authors on the phenomena, on the construction of archaeological knowledge and on the subjective and humanist perspective towards the archaeological record and its interpretation.

The author presents the mental constructions created by archaeologists in the process of compiling and explaining the archaeological records.

It also presents the symbolic and ideological aspects in the inequality of the archaeological construction of knowledge.

The author makes good reflections about the archaeologist's work, reviewing the limitations of theories and theoretical views and the techniques and the methodologies used in his studies, which are based on the properties and attributes of materiality.

The paper is well written and has an important and reflective objective so that all archaeologists can assume their positions and seek to break with old paradigms.
