I think this is not a academic article, just a commentary and experiences of the author in different countries while working with refugees. It's very helpful to read about a practitioner experience and point of view on this subject. But when we consider UK's recent steps on refugees in their country, it's not easy to say its humanatarian. It's highly important to support refugees in their own countiries and it's a team effort as the article emphasizes but maybe UK section of the article should be expanded since the most of the refugees do not live in their own country. I know that because I live in Turkey.
