Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

It is an excellent contribution on this theme of sociological conflicts, it addresses experiences of developed and developing countries, mainly in Europe, Asia, and Africa, and within the developed countries for the American Continent, it contemplates the United States of America, leaving out the rest of the countries. the countries that make up the American Continent. The analysis could be complete if it included some experiences from Latin America and the Caribbean.

It also leaves aside the cultural part, which is a key factor, which must be considered in the ancestral practices that have been maintained over time and that the great powers have taken advantage of these resources, as shown by the current crisis that is the reflection of social and economic history of the world.

The purpose of this work is to analyze five works that give differential explanations about the crisis and impoverishment, but all the hypotheses are centered on an economic construct, mainly, I believe, capitalist. It would be interesting if it could be addressed in another theoretical contribution and applied to the realities that are the ones that will give light to those inequalities that prevail today in the world.
