This is a thought-provoking article that should be of interest to anyone involved in the teaching or study of the History of Education. I think it provides a clear and concise critique of the traditional approach to teaching the history of education in antiquity. Additionally, it demonstrates a strong understanding of relevant historical and theoretical concepts. On the other hand, I think that it could provide some specific examples of alternative educational practices from non-Western cultures. As for a personal interest of mine, I would find it interesting to explore how the critique of Eurocentrism applies to the teaching of other historical periods in education.
