This work offers exciting insights into the micro level of Nigerian development and education history. However, it would benefit from articulating and contextualizing the rich details at the national level within the tapestry of global history and regional context. This would enable global readers to appreciate Nigeria's unique lessons and experiences with a comparative understanding of the story. The discussion and detailed analysis from Nigeria can be structured by providing an analytical framework from the global history and West African regional context. Most importantly, the work should address broader transnational questions regarding the merit and worth of detailed findings at the micro level and the instructive lessons it may serve for the global readers and audience.
