

Review of: "Impact of Men's Labour Migration on Non-migrating Spouses' Health: A Systematic Review"

Susmita Sengupta¹

¹ University of Burdwan

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

The topic seems very interesting. It is true that very little researches have been done on the topic. The authors have done quite a good job. They have covered almost all aspects of effects on 'left-behind' migrant women due to their husbands' migration, whether it is of long span or short. But there are a few suggestions from my end to enrich the review more, that is, more literature review is required on the status of female autonomy/decision making independence regarding 'left-behind' women's health (visiting doctor without delay, buying medicines, etc.) during husbands' absence but in the presence of other older family members in the same house.

Another question arises in mind that 'is there any rural-urban spatiality regarding the 'left-behind' women's health issue?' The authors may review that is there any difference in living condition of rural 'left-behind' women's health as compared to the urban ones?

The last important suggestion lies that the authors must pay attention to the health issues of those 'left-behind' women who are also in working condition on regular basis.