

Review of: "The Catholic School: Holistic?"

Polonca Pangrčič

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

Very comprehend article. The argumentation is on place. In my (pedagogical) opinion the first part of the article is too long and maybe too philosophical, but the second part develops its idea good and systematically. According to the title I expected a little bit more about the holistic approach in school. The article is focused more on catholic schools and it is really significant, that it describes also the 'other' part of catholic education - not only the confesional, but what is really important (in every school) the education of the Person. The Person with the capital letter, because it is ment all that makes us us. And that point of the holistic approach is even more important about catholic schools, because religion can touch our inner Person in ways that nothing else can.