There are some major issues with the article and would need a substantial revision before any consideration for publication is given. Here are some of the issues that I came across:

1. The article is poorly written as it is too wordy in most parts and there are several grammatical errors.
2. I am not convinced as to the value of this study as presented. The analysis appears to be superficial and data appears to be not current in some parts. A major rethinking is needed on the part of the authors.
3. I am also unconvinced as to the value of including UK in the study. A more credible comparison could have been made against another African country such as Mauritius.

I would recommend that the authors consider these suggestions to strengthen the value of their research.
