It is probable that this preliminary document satisfies the requirements of a business proposal, but it may not be appropriate for dissemination as an article. To render it suitable for publication, the authors may wish to commence the following actions:

1. The goal and subject matter of the article are well captured in the title. Although the abstract is quite helpful, the reader is not drawn in by it. The authors might go farther in defining methodology (data collecting, sample, sampling procedure, research tools) and emphasising the significance of the study.
2. The introduction remains a description and lacks critical and in-depth debate. The connection between the manuscript's goal and why the research was needed was not properly stated. The opening style must be consistent, and it should clarify what the problem is, what has been investigated in prior academic publications in this field, and where the actual gap exists. Furthermore, how this study solves this research gap. I recommend updating the introduction to include what has been researched on this topic as well as the research gap.
