Review of: "Vietnam's Religious Policy: Navigating the Path to Religious Freedom"

Ngakan Ketut Acwin Dwijendra[1]

1 Universitas Udayana

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

Strength of Articles:

- Provides an overview of Vietnam's religious landscape, including influences of Buddhism, Confucianism, Taoism, Catholicism, Protestantism, Hoahaoism, Kaodaism, and Islam.
- Highlights key developments, policies, and challenges for religions in Vietnam, such as restrictions on unregistered groups and the current state of religious freedom.
- Discusses the Vietnamese government's historical caution against Protestantism and the restrictions placed on Protestant churches.
- It mentions the growth of the Protestant community in recent decades, attributed to increased religious freedom, international missionary organizations, and the appeal of personal faith and community support.
- Acknowledging the government's tolerance of Cauodaism, allows the religion to practice within certain limits.
- Recognize the importance of Caodaism in Vietnamese society, despite its challenges and restrictions.
- Highlights the rise of Islam in Vietnam, with the increasing presence and preservation of cultural and religious identity by Cham Muslims.

Weakness of the article:

- It does not provide an in-depth analysis or specific examples of the challenges and restrictions faced by various religions in Vietnam.
- It does not explore the impact of government religious policies on religious communities and individuals.
- It does not discuss the role of other religions or religious movements in Vietnam's religious landscape.

Suggestions for Improvement:

- Include more specific examples and case studies to illustrate the challenges and restrictions faced by various religions in Vietnam.
- Provide a deeper analysis of the impact of government religious policies on religious communities and individuals.
- Explore the role of other religions or religious movements in Vietnam's religious landscape to provide a more comprehensive understanding.