This article is well-structured, with an introduction that justifies the necessity of using digital platforms in the university education sector, a coherently presented research methodology, and results and discussions that support the study's three hypotheses. Through the analysis of the specialized literature, the authors highlight the opportunities offered by the revolutionary development of digital platforms in improving student learning and communication between students and teachers, as well as the challenges associated with the use of digital platforms and their effective implementation. Additionally, the authors present future research directions, thereby identifying the existing gaps in the current literature on the use of digital platforms among university students. The article is a theoretical study that is worth reading.
