

Review of: "The End of Objectivity and Subjectivity in Education Sciences"

Abel Silva de Meneses

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

Congratulations on the precious reflection on the subject of the discussion.

I think that the definition of an initial point in time may seem to the reader to be a limiting factor for the epistemological thinking under discussion, since there was already some knowledge in circulation even before the first university courses. In any case, the textual construction manages to present the idea without prejudice to understanding.

The arguments about objectivity and subjectivity are well presented and can bring opportunities for reflections on objectivity in the context of subjectivity itself, because when objectivity is subject to the capacity for cognitive abstraction, it can vary depending on the angles of view that the subject has on a supposed object.