Review of the paper: "Particular Sexual and Ambitious Attitude threatens the Global Societal Functioning and Individual Wellbeing."

The authors present conclusions consisting of observations and findings made in very diverse, remote fields. The starting point of this argument is the statement that nowadays, the quality of life, wellbeing, and mental health in individual countries or regions of the world is objectively assessed. The authors point to the easily accessible "World Justice Project" platform. Anyone can click on the name of their country and familiarize themselves with the "indicator specifying 44 parameters concerning aspects such as rule of law, freedom of speech, respect for human rights."

Therefore, the authors point to the undeniable fact that in many countries around the world, the quality of life and public mental health are not good. In their article, the authors propose explanations for the reasons for this situation. They derive their theory from Jonathan Haidt's well-known findings on the differences in several characteristic attitudes of people with liberal-democratic and conservative leanings. The authors note that Jonathan Haidt's findings explain why there is a constant tendency for authoritarian regimes to emerge.

In the next step of their inference, the authors state that authoritarian regimes usually maintain a patriarchal social structure, based on enforcing the traditional taboo system regarding moral issues. The authors note that the low quality of life and poor mental health in these countries result not only from restrictions imposed by the ruling regime but also from restrictions resulting from adherence to this taboo system. The authors believe that it is possible to counteract such a situation by implementing a special educational program.

I believe that, in a situation when many of us feel numerous threats to our prosperity, every proposal explaining the sources of these threats should be carefully considered, especially when the authors of the presented analysis of the state of affairs propose actions capable of improving the situation.

I believe that the article is very valuable.
