The article is very interesting and revives and updates Amartya Sen's critique of the concept of rationality in the utilitarian theory used by modern economic theories. And he stresses the need not to separate ethics from economics.

There are however some advances within the capabilities approach that I would suggest be included in the debate in order to enrich the text, with the contributions of some authors that can be seen in the following articles: 1. Nebel, M and Herrera R. Nebel, M.T. (2018). "Measuring the meta-capability of agency: theoretical basis for creating a responsibility indicator", chapter IV, in Comim Flavio, Shailaja Fennell and P.B. Anand (2018). New Frontiers of the Capability Approach, Cambridge University Press, England; 2. Zamagni, L. and Bruno Luigini. Economy Civil, Italy. But also the contributions of the school of Salamanca in the 16th century, which already spoke of this rationality and which modern economics lost sight of.
