The study is quite interesting since the issue of infrastructure projects, which are taking a lot of the state budget and must be completed within a certain period, usually directly links to the 'coercive action' of the state and in turn potentially violates human rights. It is therefore important that the study be more comprehensive if the author can elaborate on these potential violations in terms of legal perspectives but also political-economy aspects, since the infrastructure projects also reflect the rent-seeking phenomena involving many actors, particularly those closely linked to the govt. regime.
