

Review of: "Russian Military Renaissance: An Unnecessary War"

Ihor Hurnyak¹

¹ Ivan Franko National University of Lviv

Potential competing interests: No potential competing interests to declare.

Thanks to the author for the proposed topic. At the same time, I believe that too few influencing factors are taken into account in the article. In general, economic factors are not taken into account, which does not allow us to talk about any real threat in the future at any level for the Russian side. Moreover, the current economic crisis in China makes the ability of this state to play the role of a second power illusory.

The model of the division of NATO into actually two blocs needs to be detailed and clarified.

It is appropriate to add elements of game theory to the article with an analysis of the relevant strategies of the main players or, for example, the interaction of stock markets (this is especially interesting today).