The article presents a very valuable and original comparative case study. Finds a set of criteria to bring into focus such different realities as existing between Sweden and India in examining the approaches to climate change and sustainability

I value very much the efforts to analyze the strategies employed by these two nations in addressing climate change and promoting sustainable development.

I also find very valuable insight in detailing factors contributing to Sweden's sustainability leadership, such as strong political will, collaborative partnerships, and public awareness in total divergence with India, where the complexities of pursuing sustainable development amidst a large population and varying socioeconomic conditions render some of the former inapplicable or inappropriate.

I fully support the second conclusion of the comparative study which underscores the importance of tailored approaches to climate change and sustainability based on each country's unique circumstances and proposes instead a call for all nations to collaborate, share knowledge, and implement targeted strategies, realizing that sustainable practices and a green future are vital for the present and future generations onboard our planet.
